MBGentamicin-resistant Pseudomonas aeruginosa outbreak in an obstetrics ward. From November 1994 to March 1995, 16 of 59 patients in a ward for pregnant women with ectopic pregnancy were admitted. Ten (62.5%) of them were infected with P. aeruginosa. Five (62.5%) of the patients infected with P. aeruginosa were on gentamicin therapy, whereas none of the other patients were.

Meningitis, peritonitis and septic arthritis were observed in these patients. Specimens of blood and urine of the patients were found to be positive for P. aeruginosa and gentamicin-resistant strains were isolated from the specimens of the patients. Treatment was instituted with piperacillin/tazobactam and fosfomycin. One patient was successfully treated with the antibiotics, and the other patients were given amikacin.

Image caption A banknote in 2008 shows the Glasgow Tower and the Union Flag Laying the groundwork for a full-scale coinage revival, Bank of England governor Mark Carney has suggested the pound might one day be given its own set of coins. In an interview with BBC Scotland, he said it would depend on the evidence for coinage - if the balance was in favour of the case then coins were in the offing. The Bank's latest quarterly Bulletin suggests there are, in fact, strong arguments for introducing a new range of coins. It says it is no longer enough to say that currency is "good for business". In a paper prepared for the Monetary Policy Committee (MPC) in March, the Bank noted that the case for issuing coins is stronger today than in the past. It said that "monetary policy is determined by the value of the currency" and that the value of Britain's currency was a key factor in what happens to jobs and economic growth. The main alternative to using coins is the use of notes and electronic transfers. The Bank said that current "goods and services" taxes are low in terms of their income to government, while "introducing new state-issued coinage may have a negative impact on tax avoidance and evasion."
